Jean-Pierre Laffont moved to the United States from France in 1965 to become a photojournalist and for the next three decades he spent much of his life on the road documenting the country he calls a 'photographer's paradise'.

'Nobody stops you, nobody asks about your politics, or talks about your accent or where you came from,' Laffont told the New York Times.

'As a photographer you're respected and allowed to work. In the rest of the world, especially the Arab world where I grew up, you have to tell them the name of your mother and your father and show that you are really what you are, and say that you believe in what they do — even if you don't.'
